US-China Trade Conflict: Silver Linings Not Bullets

"Great, kid, don't get cocky." —Han Solo, Star Wars - A New Hope In a Nutshell:

- > The measured approach to US-China trade antagonism is a silver lining offering interim relief, not a silver bullet for rejoicing a resolution.
- Admittedly, Trump's 10%-pt China tariff is welcome relief that it is not the 60% campaign trail tariff or the 25% trained on Mexico and Canada.
- > Equally, Beijing's restraint in targeting only a small sliver of US goods is deemed to be a deliberately less than proportionate response to avert an escalatory tit-for-tat spiral.
- > Nonetheless, the reality is that US-China trade tensions are set to structurally ramp-up, even if a negotiated compromise is the end-game for Trump 2.0 tariffs.
- > This as US' strategic posturing against China collides with Beijing's own hardened stance to protect/advance technological/industrial advantage.
- > Crucially, this means that the path to a compromise will be not only exceptionally bumpy riddled with acute "risk off" but could also eventually entail greater trade friction (than the status quo).
- Interim "risk off" is ripe for pronounced two-way CNH volatility with distinct downside risks.
- And if China's export of industrial capacity is compromised, the inadvertent exacerbation of deflation could pressure CGB yields further.
- Beijing's sensible restraint, so as not to unnecessarily hasten an escalation in the US-China trade conflict is welcome.
- Especially as it builds on Trump's measured 10%-pt lift to tariffs on China, which pales to fears of campaign bombast of 60% tariff hit as well as the 25% threatened on Mexico and Canada.
- But this is merely a temporary silver lining, not a lasting silver bullet to resolve US-China trade antagonism, which is structurally set to worsen.
- To be sure, the relief is that Beijing's response to US' universal 10%-pt (additional) tariff was probably sufficiently measured and confined to avert an escalatory tit-for-tat trade war spiral.
- By targeting just only a very limited set of US goods such as energy, agricultural machinery and selected autos, Beijing has erred on the softer side of what may be considered a proportionate response.
- What's more, , by targeting easily substitutable goods, for which China is not hobbled by US-specific reliance, Beijing has mitigated self-harm.
- Crucially, to the extent that China is not the most significant market for US exporters of these goods, the US Administration will not be unnecessarily agitated to imminently up the tariff ante.
- Nonetheless, Trump is probably on point when he says this (the sweeping 10%-pt lift) is just the opening salvo. So, relief is premature, and any (misguided) rejoice just cavalier.

- There is almost certainly more escalation to come in the undulating US-China trade conflict ahead.
- And unlike the case with Colombia, (and likely the case with Mexico and Canada), the "leverage" quotient of tariffs, and the attendant propensity to rollback, is markedly more diminished with China, given overriding geo-economic considerations.
- What's more, this time, in contrast to Trump 1.0, Beijing probably has clearer red lines.
- Especially as the US trade antagonism is now (rightly) recognized as structural feature of US strategic policy (agnostic to Administration) and not just a (temporary) bug of the Trump's Presidency.
- Consequently, Beijing's is likely to assume far more unyielding positions if it assesses that industrial/technological advantage is compromised or ceded.
- To be sure, we expect that Trump 2.0 will make its way to a negotiated compromise rather than a escalatory, mutually destructive (for demand) spiral.
- But the path to this compromise will be exceptionally bumpy. And the end-game could suffer more trade friction than the current status quo.
- CNH Volatility/Downside Risks: In the meantime, it is best to be hedged (buckle up) for CNH whiplash, with more distinct bouts of weakness left as Trump ups the ante (as he is prone to).
- CGB Yield Pressures: Moreover, if the trade conflict at any point compromises China's ability to ship spare capacity offshore (to export), this could accentuate deflationary pressures, sending CGB yields lower.
